President's Message

Our next meeting is a recruitment meeting. I hope you will do your very best to invite a guest to attend. I know some of you may be uncomfortable talking about Civitan. I wanted to reprint information from one of our brochures on how you can promote Civitan.

"What is Civitan? The first step in preparation to Talk Civitan is to develop a quick description about Civitan. Below are three sample elevator speeches to help you develop one for yourself. Basically, it is your response if you get in an elevator on the first floor and someone looks at your lapel pin and asks "What is Civitan?" Civitan is a community service organization made up of clubs. Each club operates locally with volunteer members giving their time to make their community a better place to live. Our club offers members the opportunity to make a difference. You should join our ranks. I would be glad to take you to our club's next meeting or better yet our next project. Civitan is a club of volunteers meeting local needs in the community. Our club works with youth, senior citizens, and people with developmental disabilities. Our next meeting is Thursday. You should attend and learn more about how we impact our community. Our speaker is . . . Civitan is a way to improve the lives of others in our community while we enrich our own lives. We are volunteers meeting local community needs. We are most known for our work that helps people with developmental disabilities. Our club meets next week. I would like you to visit as my guest.”

Please take the time to put the above guidelines for promoting our practice.

I am extremely proud of each of you for the outstanding work we are doing in the community. Special thanks is giving to each of you who took the time to give or walk with March Dimes. As we celebrate our first year a club together. Let us all remain true to our Civitan Creed.

Yours in Civitan,

Jimmy DuRante

5/18, Our guest speaker, Mr. Shannon Piller, will speak on the topic below:

Human trafficking arrives in Greenville

Greenville County sheriff's deputy and human trafficking investigator Shannon Piller said human trafficking has arrived in Greenville, and it "comes in so many different forms."

Greenville County had five cases last year where suspects were charged for human trafficking, Piller said, and he is actively investigating other cases. Based on that number, human trafficking may not appear to be a big problem in Greenville, but many cases are either misidentified as something else or go unreported, he said.

“I think there’s a significant amount of victims in Greenville, and the challenge is identifying them,” Piller said. Educating the public and law enforcement to know what to look for is important, he said.

Tricia Ravenhorst, a lawyer and victim advocate with South Carolina Victim Assistant Network (SCVAN), said she is often asked, “What is trafficking? What does it look like?”

State and national experts say human trafficking can be forced labor or sex trafficking. According to the U.S. State Department, signs of human trafficking victimization can include: someone living with an employer, multiple people in a cramped space, the inability to speak to an individual alone, scripted or rehearsed answers, or someone who appears submissive or fearful.

“If you don’t have a victim who will cooperate, it is very difficult to bring a conviction.”

Ravenhorst said several years ago she didn’t have any human trafficking cases, but she now receives calls weekly about possible trafficking incidences. Part of her job is educating law enforcement on what to look for in human trafficking cases, she said.

Greenville law enforcement is tackling the crime proactively before it grows, Piller said. He compared it to gangs and meth labs that weren’t seen as major problems when they started cropping up but are now serious concerns in the area. A major hub of human trafficking, especially in the Southeast, is nearby in Atlanta, he said.

When charging a human trafficker, Piller said the victim’s willingness to testify becomes crucial. “If you don’t have a victim who will cooperate, it is very difficult to bring a conviction,” he said.

Many times trafficking victims won’t testify because they believe the trafficker loves them, they depend on him or her for financial support, or they fear criminal charges against themselves.

One common misconception about trafficking victims is that they are always female. “I wish we would start acknowledging the fact that boys are the victims of sex trafficking,” he said.

Community efforts

The recent push to stop human trafficking nationwide is driven largely by community grassroots efforts to educate the public of the reality of the problem, Ravenhorst said. “At first those people were dismissed as crazy,” but now the public is much more aware, she said.

Piller said people should call 911, the National Human Trafficking Resource Center at 1-888-3737-888, or 23-CRIME if they suspect the crime. “I would just stress that they call someone and don’t ignore even a small clue or suspicion.”

The creation of the state’s Human Trafficking Task Force in 2012 by the Attorney General’s Office greatly aided community groups in connecting with each other and educating the public, said Leslie Christ, executive director of Hopewood Haven, a shelter for women trafficking victims. She said fundraising and outreach “efforts are starting to work together largely because of the task force.”

Christ said she is now more easily able to connect with organizations looking for shelter for victims.

Stephanie Johnson, founder of Switch, said seven out of nine of the victims her group has worked with are currently being trafficked or were trafficked as a child. Trafficking is common at strip clubs, where pimps will drop off women and tell them to make a certain commission, she said. If the women don’t make enough money, many times the pimps physically abuse them.

Switch representatives go on regular outreaches to befriend victims and help them out of the trafficking industry, Johnson said. Part of that outreach involves talking to men and youth about how watching pornography or going to strip clubs helps fuel the sex trafficking industry.

Johnson said one the most rewarding parts of the outreach she does was seeing one the oldest victims that the group has helped attend college to study to work in the medical field. “The Lord is doing something mighty and has a lot of things in the works,” she said.
